Herbert S. Klein - YouTube The Wieung family would not be part of the Peter Benedict's journey. To my total dismay, I asked the family to convey my appreciation and gratitude to them. Thank you for your time and for your message. A: Your string "SEH: There was no such thing as a STRING in 10.3" is not particularly a proof, but is a mere statement. It is an (un)spoken assertion of the creator, i.e. the maintainer, of a particular piece of software, and it is a subjective statement. It can be accepted or rejected, there is no right way to do this. For instance, knowing that MS Office 2007 ran on Java Enterprise Edition 5.0.2, you could say that the string claims that Office 2007 would run on any JEE5.0.2 version, but also that it actually only runs on JEE5.0.2a, because this is the only version known to be certified for Office 2007. You could also say that the string states that Office 2007 requires JEE5.0.2a, because this is the only version available in the Microsoft TechNet gallery, and the statement is in the default download section as well. If you then go into the TechNet download gallery and search for the same software, you will notice that there are two downloads, one of which is labelled "JEE 5.0.2a" and the other just "JEE5.0.2" (but including those brackets). Apparently, the former is the only one that the original author considered worth presenting as a certified version. And you have no idea how they could know it. It could have come from Microsoft, it could have come from the original author, or it could have been a random selection made by some guy at the download site. So all you have is an unspoken assertion, and you cannot evaluate it as true or false (with a few minor exceptions that I shall explain later). In your case, you find that the string states the following: It is a certainty that at any given time during the life of a product, there is a version of that product that is guaranteed to work. In the case of Office, the latest version of Office 2010 will work with Office 2003, for instance. The word "guaranteed" is vague and can be treated as an unspoken assertion. 1cdb36666d
